Scientists have glimpsed the event horizon of a black hole for the very first time. The world first image shows the supermassive black hole at the centre of M87, a neighbouring galaxy to our own Milky Way The image is the result of a seven-year project linking telescopes all over the world to create 'a dish the size of the planet' The fact the image matches so closely to predictions is a confirmation of Einstein's theory of general relativity. Until now, every image of a black hole you have ever seen has been an artist's impression. "We've been studying black holes so long that sometimes it's easy to forget that none of us has actually of the US National Science Foundation, at one of seven simultaneous press conferences where the simultaneous press conferences where the scientists announced their findings to the world.

MODERN DANCE ODORI 126. THE BLACK HOLE

Christopher Lawrie 2019

9 Archival Inkjet Prints A2 ea. 42 x 59.4 cm Total Size: 146 x 200 cm

Scientists have glimpsed the event horizon of a black hole for the very first time. The world-first image shows the supermassive black hole at the centre of M87, a neighbouring galaxy to our own Milky Way The image is the result of a seven year project linking telescopes all over the world to create 'a dish the size of the planet' The fact the image matches so closely to predictions is a confirmation of Einstein's theory of general relativity. Until now, every image of a black hole you have ever seen has been an artist's impression. "We've been studying black holes so long that sometimes it's easy to forget that none of us has actually seen one," said France Cordova, director of the US National Science Foundation, at one of seven simultaneous press conferences where the scientists announced their findings to the world.

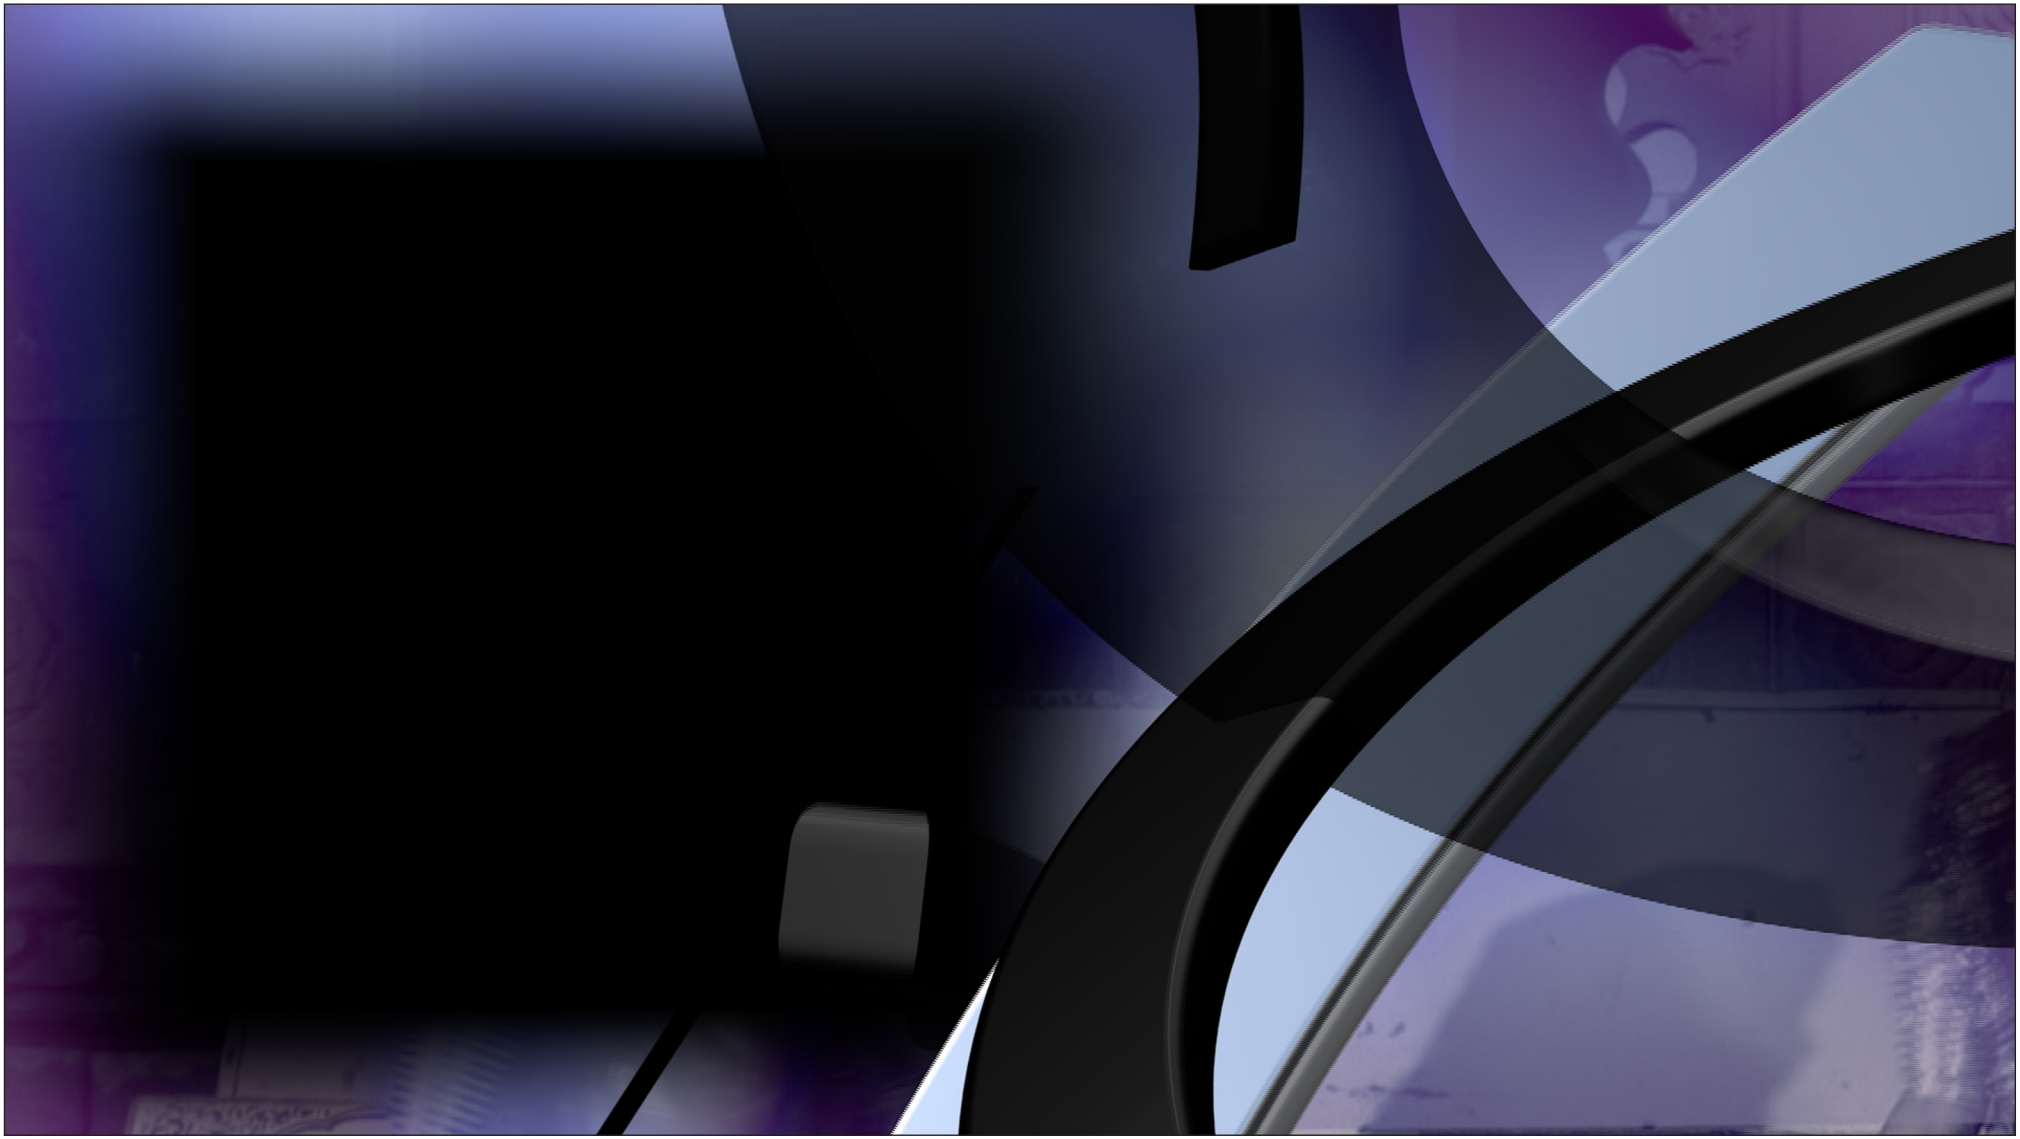
Scientists have glimpsed the event horizon of a black hole for the very first time. The world-first image shows the supermassive black hole at the centre of M87, a neighbouring galaxy to our own Milky Way The image is the result of a seven year project linking telescopes all over the world to create 'a dish the size of the planet' The fact the image matches so closely to predictions is a confirmation of Einstein's theory of general relativity. Until now, every image of a black hole you have ever seen has been an artist's impression. "We've been studying black holes so long that sometimes it's easy to forget that none of us has actually seen one," said France Cordova, director of the US National Science Foundation, at one of seven simultaneous press conferences where the scientists announced their findings to the world.

Transcript from AM. on ABC Local Radio.



Scientists have glimpsed the event horizon of a black hole for the very first time. The world first image shows the supermassive black hole at the centre of M87, a neighbouring galaxy to our own Milky Way The image is the result of a seven-year project linking telescopes all over the world to create 'a dish the size of the planet' The fact the image matches so closely to predictions is a confirmation of Einstein's theory of general relativity. Until now, every image of a black hole you have ever seen has been an artist's impression. "We've been studying black holes so long that sometimes it's easy to forget that none of us has actually seen one," said France Cordova, director of the US National Science Foundation, at one of seven simultaneous press conferences where the scientists announced their findings to the world.